The Master of Human Resource Development (MHRD) degree program at Clemson University prepares people to become strategic thinkers and problem solvers who can address a broad spectrum of human or organizational performance issues within business, industry, government, athletic administration, non-profit organizations, and the military. HRD specialists commonly help organizations and people identify performance gaps and deliver appropriate interventions that improve human performance in the workplace.

What is the MHRD program?

The MHRD program was developed around the competencies identified as essential for effective leadership in the areas of human performance improvement. The HRD field draws from systems design, psychology, education, sociology, organization development and management theory.

How do our MHRD students learn?

Offered 100% online, the 2-year, 36-hour MHRD degree is designed for in-career professionals. The MHRD program is taught by practitioner-scholars using the latest web-based technologies to create an interactive environment that meets the needs of busy professionals.

What do MHRD graduates gain?

MHRD graduates gain a degree from a top 25 public university and the specialized skills and practical knowledge to help them take the next step in their careers. Our students benefit from the collaboration with fellow students from across the U.S. and the extensive Clemson alumni network.
