Blueprint Genova is a proposal by Architect Renzo Piano which attempts to reconnect Genova to the city. It reconfigures the perimeter of the city that runs from Porta Siberia to Punta Vagno, attempting to build a bridge between citizen's demands and those of port operaition.

The competition aims to redevelop the former trade fair site located along Corso Aurelio Saffi. The urban void of the former Genoa trade fair is one of the most fragile situations between Piazzale Kennedy and the Rotonda di Carignano offer a unique opportunity to restore a seafront to the city, and to reposition the sports activities in areas and situations of better quality, with all the appropriate facilities for water sports. The structural system is a combination of a reinforced concrete flat slab system with prestressed slabs and hollow steel members to form the arched structural members supporting the connection bridge. V-columns hold up the residential units above the swimming area, creating an interesting visual element.

The facade is based on a double skin system of cladding where the inner skin is glass and the exterior is a combination of Corten (Weathering steel) and cement fibre boards finished to resemble wood panels. Depending on the orientation of the interior space, the external facade will have dense shading if it faces the southern and southwestern sunlight while it will have lighter shading elements if it faces north. These wooden panels would be assembled into louvred system controllable by the user.
