Student Scholarships

There has never been a better time to establish the Harvey S. Peeler Jr. College of Veterinary Medicine. A shortage of veterinarians has decreased access to healthcare for animals - both companion and farm animals. The college is not only necessary, but it is also a wise move for the state of South Carolina. Clemson University's status as a land-grant institution supports a robust pre-veterinary program in the College of Agriculture, Forestry and Life Sciences, complemented by comprehensive livestock and teaching farm resources. We know there is a need. We have established the solution. Now, we need your support.

*How giving to our college
can benefit
students*

- Scholarships help the college recruit and retain the most qualified students.
- Scholarships give students freedom to pursue externships and research opportunities.
- Scholarships may encourage recipients to commit to serving in areas of greatest need such as rural and agricultural regions.

At the Harvey S. Peeler Jr. College of Veterinary Medicine, scholarships do more than fund education; they fuel purpose. Each award opens doors for aspiring veterinarians to serve South Carolina's animals, communities and agricultural industry with skill, compassion and innovation. Together, we can make a world of difference!

Scholarships provide access and reduce barriers which will allow the next generation of veterinarians to transform lives.

Scholarships ensure that financial need never limits a student's potential. Veterinary education is one of the most intensive professional programs in the nation, requiring years of academic and clinical training. Through scholarship support, Clemson empowers students from all backgrounds, including those from rural or underrepresented communities, to pursue their calling in animal health and public service.

“Our goal is to provide scholarship support to as many students as possible in our DVM program. Your commitment will help Clemson University offer this opportunity to all deserving students, allowing them to reach higher and dream bigger than they thought possible.”
